Lessons Investors can learn from Rahul Dravid's cricket Part:2

It is important to understand that making money from investment is not only the function of intelligence. Many of the behavioral aspects like Focus, Discipline etc play important role in determining the investing success. In this regard, Mr. Saurabh Mukherjea shows what to learn from Rahul Dravid's cricket. The article is taken from The Economic Times

(<https://economictimes.indiatimes.com/markets/stocks/news/lessons-investors-can-learn-from-rahul-dravids-cricket/articleshow/80381050.cms>)

As the years went by and as Dravid rose up the cricketing pantheon, his mental conditioning techniques were perfected to a high level of proficiency.

Vijeta, Rahul Dravid's wife recollects, that around 2006-07:

When we began to travel with the kids... we made sure we got two rooms, next to each other. The day before every match, the boys were told that their father had to be left alone for a while, and he was. He would go into his room and meditate or maybe to do a few visualization exercises. On the morning of the game, he would get up and do another session of meditation before leaving for the ground. I have tried meditation myself and I know that the zone Rahul is able to get into as quickly as he does takes a lot of years of training to reach.”

The sum total of everything we have discussed so far allows you to visualise not just a supremely skilful cricketer, but also one whose mental conditioning has given him enormous reserves of mental strength. Dravid himself pulled the entire construct together in an interview he did for Cricinfo editor Sambit Bal in 2004:

I try to have as many nets as possible in the last couple of days before the match. When I feel comfortable with my game, I stop. Then I start thinking about the match. I look at the wicket. I try to analyse the kind of bowlers I will be playing, their strengths and weaknesses. I replay in my mind the memories of my last encounter with them. I look at videos if they're available. If a bowler got me out last time, I try to think about how I got out, what mistake I committed. And I do my best to be in a relaxed state of mind, because that's when I play at my desk. I try to slow things down a couple of days before the game. I have long lunches, do things in an unhurried way. The morning of the match, I always get up a couple of hours before we have to get to the ground, so that I have plenty of time to get ready. I take my time to have a bath, wear my clothes, eat breakfast. I never rush things...”

In addition, as his career progressed, David sought feedback from peers and introspected on his to understand his weaknesses. Then he figured out technical solutions to these weaknesses using his cricketing intelligence and then spent hundreds of hours at the nets fixing these issues.

Finally, he implemented these technical fixes in live cricket matches against high quality opposition.

John Wright, the coach of Indian team from 2000-05, noted this before most other people:

He never made the same mistake twice. He learnt hugely in one-day cricket – which probably was an area he had to work at a little bit more than others. He had been dropped from the Indian One-Day team and then went on to come back and have a very good World Cup [in 2003]... He had all the shots, but he worked hard at turning the strike over, getting the singles, and dropping the ball on the on side, when you normally might put it on the off side. At the start, people would try to slow him down, but then he worked out a way so they couldn't do that."

In the published material that is available on Rahul Dravid, this case study – of how Dravid sorted out his One-Day cricket batting – is covered in some detail. This ability - to understand and acknowledge one's weaknesses, then to figure out a solution and finally to have the mental strength required to implement the fix in front of a global audience – is very rare.

It is unlikely that this suite of characteristics can be coached into a person; you need the said individual to have the curiosity and the mindset to grow in this fashion.

Dravid had that growth mindset from an early age.

Greg Chappell, who was India's coach for much of Dravid's tenure as captain of the Indian team from 2005-07, said:

Rahul is an avid reader, who reads in the search of knowledge with which to improve himself. He is a like a child in that he constantly asks questions and then asks why when you give him an answer. In that way, he was eminently coachable. He could take concepts and turn them into action because of his intelligence and a strong belief in his ability."

Dravid's wife, Vijeta, says even if he had a bad on the cricket field, his growth mindset would help him bounce back:

At the end of the day's play, he may be thinking about it, his batting may bother him... but at that point he can compartmentalise his life very well. He won't order room service or brood indoors. He would rather go out, find something to do: go to a movie or watch musicals – which he loves. He will walk out to the sea or go to the bookstores."

As in Test cricket, so in investing, the most successful investors are those who not only work on their technical skillset but also think deeply about the underlying workings of great companies. Such investors are then able to see the companies in a way that nobody else can; in specific these investors are able to gain insights into the functioning of these companies that no one else has.

Furthermore, by introspecting and by reviewing their previous investment decisions, such investors are able to identify deficiencies in their investment toolset.

Then, David-like these investors proceed to identify remedies to their deficiencies. The greatest investors, like the greatest Test cricketers, are a combination of strong technical skills combined with a growth mindset.
