Lessons Investors can learn from Rahul Dravid's cricket Part:1

It is important to understand that making money from investment is not only the function of intelligence. Many of the behavioral aspects like Focus, Discipline etc play important role in determining the investing success. In this regard, Mr. Saurabh Mukherjea shows what to learn from Rahul Dravid's cricket. The article is taken from The Economic Times

More than any other cricketer, Rahul Dravid's career has plenty of lessons for the rest of us, regarding the power of mental conditioning and psychological training techniques.

By any meaningful reckoning... he was India's greatest match-winning batsman, with 24 away wins (Sachin Tendulkar has 20), where he averaged nearly 70. When imponderables are introduced into the equation, with such things as the ability to absorb pressure and match impact, he is the greatest series-defining batsman in the history of Test cricket, his count of eight series-defining performances greater than anybody else's.

Suresh Menon in Rahul Dravid - Timeless Steel: Collected Writings on Indian Cricket's Go-to Man (2012)

Rahul Dravid's performance statistics show that he is the greatest Test batsman India has ever had. And yet, if you ask sportswriters and other cricketers of Dravid's era as to why he was successful, the consensus view was that "Dravid succeeds because he keeps it simple."

So, if it is so easy to succeed by keeping it simple, why don't more cricketers do it?

Why is 'simple' not easy?

At the core of outsized success in any walk of life – including batting and investing – lies the ability of a small number of individuals to train their minds to achieve outcomes that appear to be beyond the reach of 99.99% of the population. While what these individuals do might be simple, that does not mean it is easy. There are, broadly speaking, five sets of reasons why it is not easy to bat like Rahul Dravid.

First, Dravid's training and his basic mental conditioning started he was around eight years old. That's when his coach, Keki Tarapore, started teaching him the importance of playing with a straight bat and the central role of relentless practice in attaining a high level of skill. Long before Malcolm Gladwell wrote about his famous '10,000 hours of practice' principle in Outliers (2008), thousands of Indian coaches like Keki Tarapore (for Dravid), Ramakant Achrekar (for Sachin Tendulkar) and Desh Azad (for Kapil Dev) trained their wards to follow this principle. As Fazal Khaleel, Dravid's teammate from his school cricket team, who also played Ranji Trophy cricket with him, recalls:

"He paid attention to detail, especially the basics. If his form was not good, he would go back to shadow-practice – to the hanging ball. When correcting our basics, our coach, Keki Tarapore, would tell us that if the bat did not come down straight, the ball would travel at an angle.

“He paid attention to detail, especially the basics. If his form was not good, he would go back to shadow-practice – to the hanging ball. When correcting our basics, our coach, Keki Tarapore, would tell us that if the bat did not come down straight, the ball would travel at an angle.

Rahul never forgot the instruction. Interestingly, he never made any change to his basic cricket or in his approach to the game. Right from his school days, he has played the same way. Playing in the V came naturally to him and he never altered it.”

While many schoolboys growing up in India’s big metros might have access to such coaching and batting facilities, where Dravid really pulled away from his peers was in his appetite for practice. John Wright, who coached the Indian cricket team from 2000-05, was the first to tell the world how seriously he took net practice:

I have never seen a more dedicated cricketer than Rahul in the nets. He was able to simulate a game situation, not just by going through the motions, but by making every ball count. It was like he didn’t want to get out even in the nets. In a situation when we had three or four bowlers going at him, he wanted to compete. He was always testing himself...”

Not only was Rahul practising in the nets, mentally, he was practising the shots in his everywhere and all the time. His wife, Vijeta, discovered this fact shortly after they got married:

“When I went to Melbourne and Sydney [in January 2004]....I was still trying to get to know him, know his game. It was only then I began to notice how he would prepare: his routines, his obsession with shadow practice at all hours of the day, which I first found very weird...”

In addition to these strengths, Rahul Dravid was one of the first Test cricketers to start using set routines and mental conditioning techniques to improve his game. Dravid started practising these routines, when he was a schoolboy cricketer. As Fazal Khaleel, Dravid’s teammate from school and Ranji cricket, sa

As a roommate, Rahul was difficult as well as easy to share with. He wanted a zen-like atmosphere in the room – everything peaceful and calm. He was quiet and meditative, would not watch TV much; he read books instead... He had his set routines and rituals, even in those days. He would do breathing exercises and clean his nostrils using the ancient practice of Jalneti.”
